"A collection of articles on various topics of importance that occurred in the past decade. The articles are well documented, with introductions that help capsulize the events. Students will find the chronology helpful, as well as the listing of further resources." -- "School Library Journal" (March 2003)

We now have three titles in this series, and I love them. We homeschool, and I use these to help me get very indepth in a short amount of times so that I can then have more to say about the topics than a textbook gives. Since I don't have the time to read indepth historical books about each topic, this is great. Each is a collection of 20-30 articles (maybe more?), most of them either primary sources (diary entries, excerpts from autobiographies, original documents, newspaper articles from the time period, etc.) or secondary sources (historians writing from primary sources). Many of these secondary sources are chapters excerpted from books or reprinted journal articles and give more depth about a particular incident or prevailing attitude (prejudice against native Americans, for example) or custom. If you find a particular writer or historical figure compelling, you can then do more research there (John Smith wrote an incredible history!). A little pricier than I like, but that's why I buy them one at a time as I need them. They're definitely worth it. I definitely see my kids reading them when they get to upper high school. The perspectives are so much more mature, the explanations so much more complex, than regular history textbooks. The limitation is that because of the specificity and depth, the overall perspective is not there. There are no illustrations or maps (which I missed). But it is understood that by the time you are reading these, you already know the basics and have access to those elsewhere (which we do). Excellent.

A good book for history

Thank you!
